Not at all.

I guess?

Heck yeah!

The company culture made my work experience feel meaningful and I enjoyed coming to work.

Nope. I dreaded going to work.

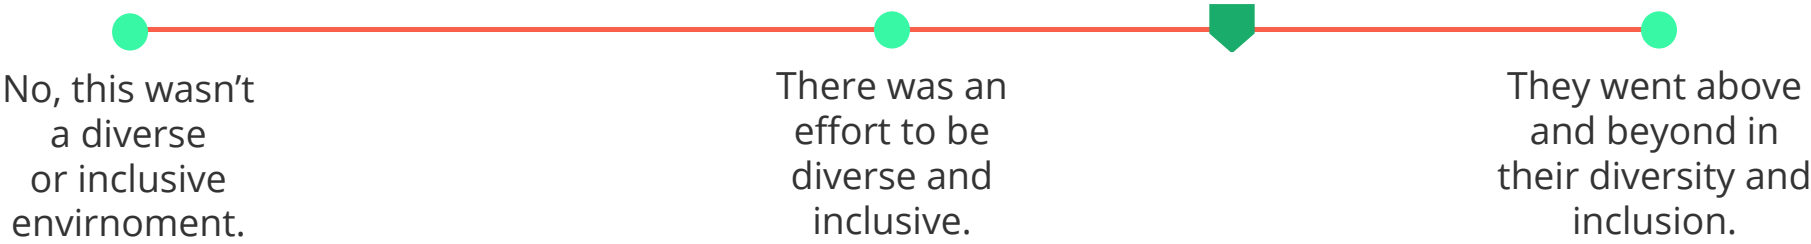

It was fine, but not notable.

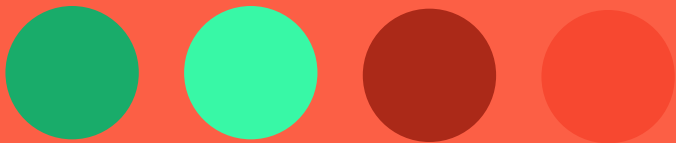

I loved my office environment.

← I felt that the the company emphasized hiring a diversity of talent, and was inclusive to other people’s identities, not just my own. →

NBC News Specials - Internship

The facility, office and equipment at my office always met the standards I needed to be effective at my job.

The building was basically falling apart.

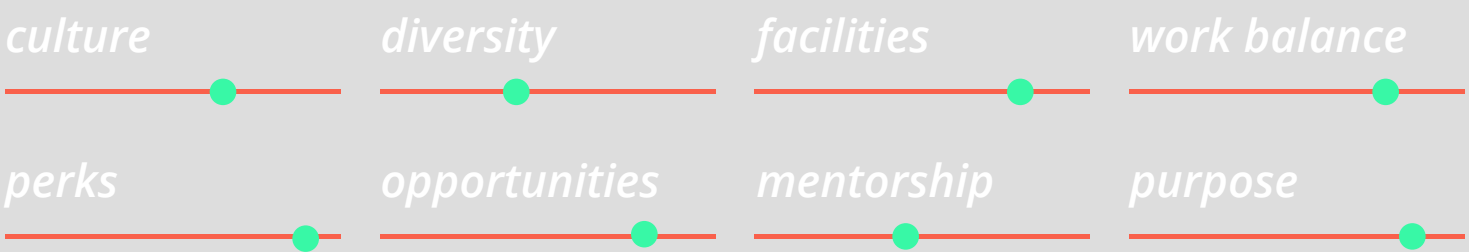

The facility and equipment were adequate, but nothing special.

Wow. I want to move into my office.

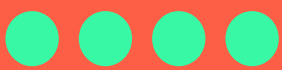

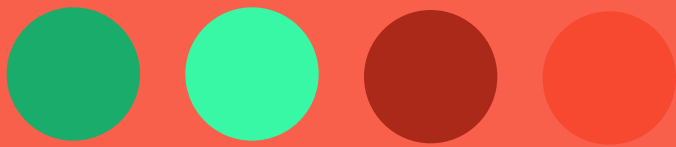

Great! You finished rating the software engineering co-op at Google.

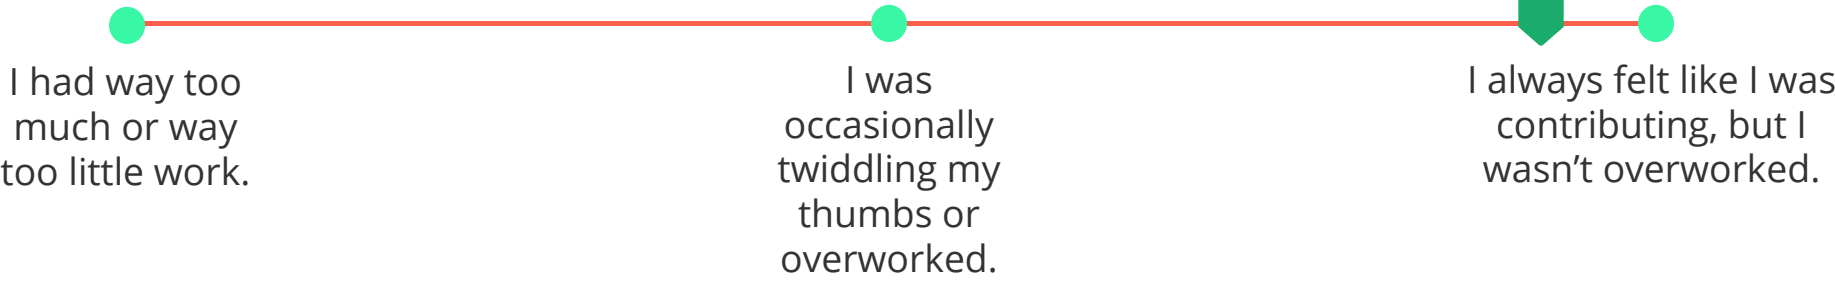

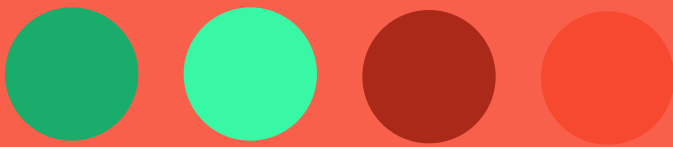

Now write your review. Don't forget to keep your ratings in mind and give us more detail.

I had the right balance of work to do during my internship. I was never overworked, but I was also never left with nothing to do.

My company offered job perks that went beyond paying well.

I might have collected some company swag. Or pens.

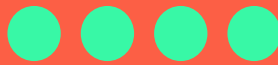

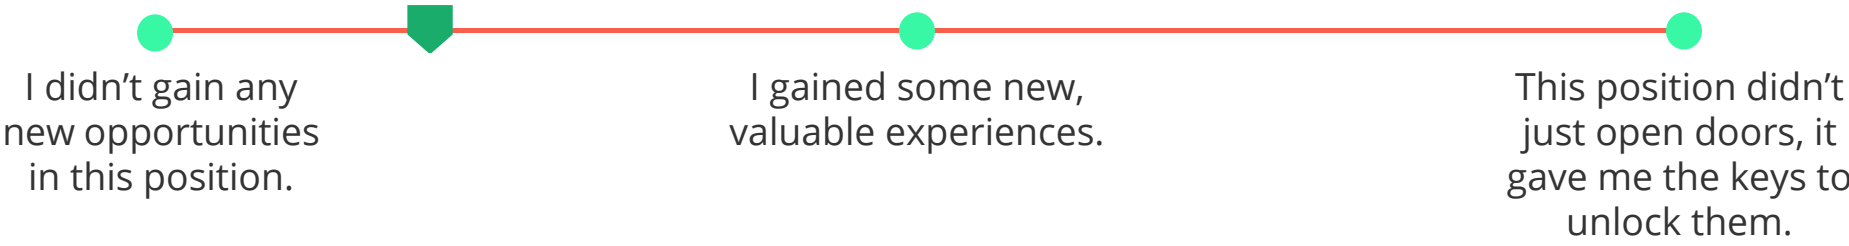

There were one or two cool perks that were more valuable than just a t-shirt.

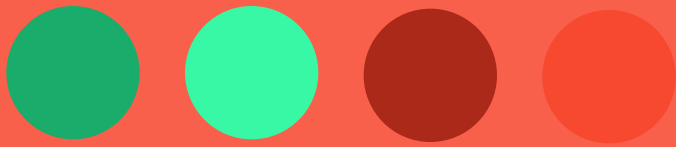

I am so well taken care of by my company I feel like royalty.

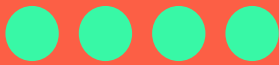

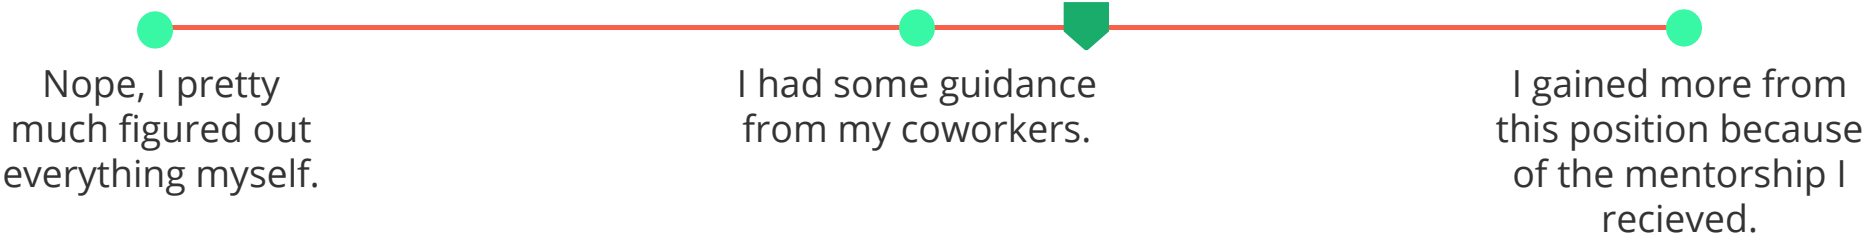

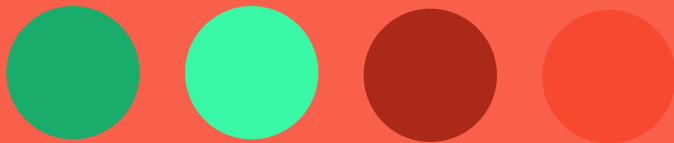

Because of my position, I was able to gain valuable, new experiences. Opportunities were widely available and they opened doors for me.

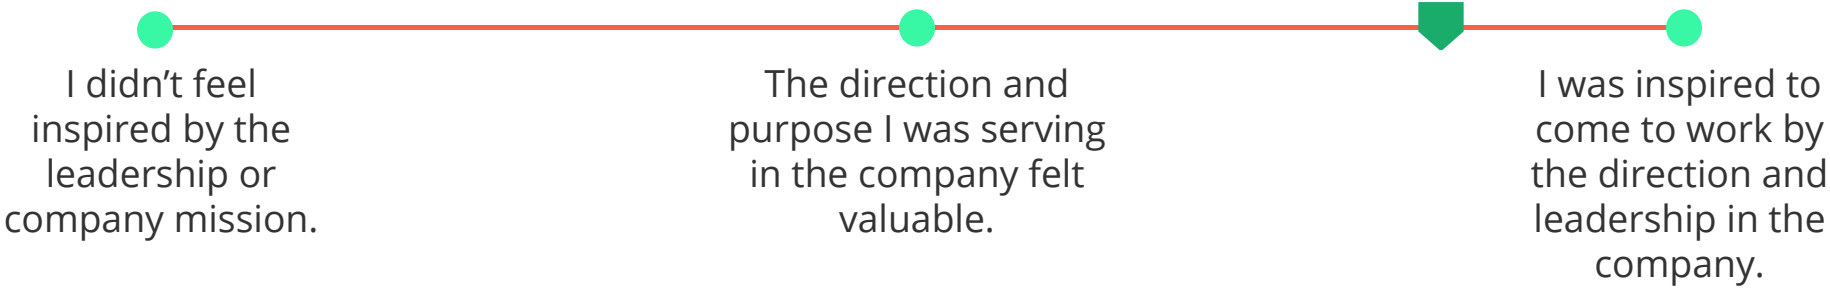

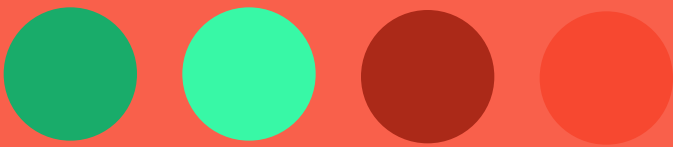

My coworkers were able to help teach me new things, act as a mentor, and guide me as I grew in my position.

I felt inspired by the leadership and direction of the company and that my work was a meaningful, purpose-driven contribution to those goals.

Welcome to Cooperate. Get it. Co-op, rate. We thought it was clever.

Co-ops and internships are great. Super cool. They give students a chance to practice in their field, take advantage of increasingly competitive perks, and open doors to full-time jobs.

But it's not always clear what you're getting into when you accept an offer. Jobs don't always match their descriptions, interns get stuck doing more coffee runs than meaningful work, and students end up being overworked because they're cheap or free labor.

We wanted to make this process a little more clear, and provide students the opportunity to give honest feedback to each other about their co-op and internship positions. We develop our ratings based on responses on eight categories: culture, inclusivity, facilities, work balance, perks, opportunities, mentorship and purpose.

Privacy is key to this process. Users remain anonymous, and reviews aren't posted until a minimum number of reviews (set by the user) become available.

So go out there! Gain experience! Just don't forget to share your insights when you return.
